

Medication on campus is an important issue to both NaBITA and the American College Counseling Association (ACCA). As such, the two organizations partnered to create a brief paper on outlining the common issues related to psychiatric medication for college students. The non-technical paper offers a bird's eye view of the common medications prescribed for students and insight related to when and where students should be referred for medication, who should prescribe, and how involved the student's family can or should be in the process.

This nine-page summary paper is useful for residential life, counseling and medical professionals, law enforcement, student affairs, and faculty. We suggest making copies at staff meetings and sharing around your campus community.

NaBITA offers its thanks to ACCA for partnering with us on this important project.

The American College Counseling Association is made up of diverse mental health professionals from the fields of counseling, psychology, and social work. NaBITA and ACCA's shared theme is working within higher education settings. ACCA strives to support and enhance the practice of college counseling, to promote ethical and responsible professional practice, to promote communication and exchange among college counselors across service areas and institutional settings, to encourage cooperation with other organizations related to higher education and college student development, and to provide leadership and advocacy for the profession of counseling in higher education. The American College Counseling Association is a division of the American Counseling Association.
